Children's Corners

In many places, libraries are the only way kids can find books

In lots of communities around the world, children don't have many books at home or at school. Sometimes, schools only have a few textbooks for everyone to share, and buying books is too expensive for many families.

So libraries become really important. But what if those libraries don't have special spaces just for kids, or only have a few old books that aren't very fun to read? And what if the librarians don't feel sure about how to help children find books they'll enjoy?

When that happens, children miss out. They might never get the chance to enjoy reading or learn how powerful stories can be.

How Children's Corners support young readers

Children's Corner projects create areas in libraries especially for children and young people.

As well as providing at least 2,500 brand-new children's books, Book Aid International gives grants so that their partners can refurbish library spaces. Which means people can create unique Children's Corners especially for their community, each one bursting with colour.
